Maine Was Painted Red By Prehistoric Indians
The original spreaders of red paint in Maine were a tribe of Indians who flourished centuries before the white man was born and whose habitat was along the Penobscot River, near Bangor, Bangor (Maine) correspondent in the New York Times.

There once lived in Maine a mysterious people, mysterious to us, for our knowledge of them is meager, this writer says.

Scientists they were gone even before the coming of those Indian tribes we have been occupying Maine when the first Europeans visited our shores.

The little known of them has been gleaned mostly by a study of their ancient cemeteries and the enduring objects buried in them.

This scanty knowledge has stimulated such speculations as the use of loadings of nickel-iron wire makes it possible to send several messages over the same line simultaneously. Nearly 15,000 miles of such continuously loaded cable now span the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.
