London Bridge Situated At Head of Navigation

London bridge is the first or farthest down of the bridges across the Thames at London. It is situated at the head of navigation, about a half mile above the Tower of London.

But the present London bridge is not the one celebrated in the nursery song, nor in the proverb to the effect that "London bridge was made for wise men to pass over and fools to pass under." That famous old bridge, which stood for more than 600 years, was finally demolished more than a century ago, obscured by a series of the Elizabeth Plain Dealer.

The site has probably been the location of a bridge from very early times in London's history. But the earliest bridge at this location is not mentioned until the Eleventh century. It was a wooden structure which was destroyed by a storm and high tide November 16, 1091.

The first stone bridge, the famous bridge spoken of above, was built between 1176 and 1209 on a wooden foundation. It consisted of 20 arches. The roadway was 926 feet long, 60 feet above the water and 40 feet wide. Houses were built upon the bridge, and in the course of time it became a narrow street with three openings on each side of the river.

The buildings on the bridge were repeatedly devastated by fire, most notably in the great fire of 1666. The eleventh span from the Southwark end was burned. Cambridge flanked by a tower built in 1426, and on top of which were stuck the heads of persons executed for treason. All the super-structures were removed in 1757. In 1832 the old bridge itself was torn down. The new and present London bridge having been opened the year before.
