'Yiddish' Serves as an International Language

"Yiddish" is a corruption of German "Jiddisch," meaning Jewish. Yiddish is the native language of Jewish people who dwelt in the Rhineland sections of Germany during the Middle ages and settled in Poland, Russia and other Slavic countries. These emigrants from Germany retained their Low German language but wrote it in Hebrew characters. They were isolated so many centuries from those who spoke German that their language showed much of the local dialects and gradually became a regular in grammar, spelling and pronunciation, finally evolving into a distinct folk-tongue. It acquired many Hebrew, Polish and Russian words, as well as a variation of words of Latin origin. Thus Yiddish is essentially a Low German dialect which has developed under Slavic influences and which has been carried to all parts of the world by Jews from eastern Europe, states a writer in the Indianapolis News. It is so utterly spoken by Jews that it serves as a sort of international language for them.

The Hebrew characters employed in writing and printing give written Yiddish more the appearance of Hebrew than German. Roughly speaking, however, the vocabulary contains 70 per cent of German words, 20 of Hebrew and 10 of Slavic. During the Hitler persecution by Yiddish grammar and spelling were made more uniform and there is an extensive literature printed in the language.

'Praying Mantis' Insect Lives in Warm Sections

The mantis insect belongs to family mantidae, genus mantis, species mantis (religiosa), is a voracious, carnivorous insect, called also "praying mantis" and "mule-killer," when watching for prey, of sitting up with the forelegs folded as if in prayer. The French call it "petite chevaux" and "cochon" (little horse and cockroach). The Greeks called it (Greek mantis) These insects are found in warm climates, usually sit on the branches of trees and shrubs waiting for some other insect to pass, when they seize and hold it with their fore feet, and tear it to pieces.

The mantis is a very much abundant in tropical regions, especially in Africa, where they are venerated by the Hottentots, but they are found also in the warmer parts of Europe, Australia, and Asia. The Chinese (mantis species (stagomantis carolina), known as "praying mantis," "devil-horse," and "mule-killer," found in the Southern and Western states, devours caterpillars and insects and he does much good. A South American species (mantis gigantea) (ma) is said to catch and devour even small birds.

Name Richard Favorite With Batting Normans

The name Richard, of Teutonic origin, means "powerful ruler." It was a favorite name with the Normans when they conquered England and has been popular ever since, writes Florence A. Cowles in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Richard the Lion-Hearted (1157-99) was the first and greatest of three kings of England to bear this name. The nickname he got was formed during the third crusade, which made him famous in romance and legend. St. Richard (d. 1253) was bishop of Chichester.

Many other famous men of the past have borne this name. A few of them: Lancelot (d. 1845) English poet who wrote "I had not loved thee, dear, so much, loved not honor more"; Cameron (d. 1880) Scottish Covenanter, founder of the sect of Cameronians; Baxter (d. 1691) English divine, author of "Saints' Everlasting Rest"; Monsieur d'Orsay (d. 1860) the leader of his troops in the attack on Quebec; Glover (d. 1785) English poet; Lee (d. 1794) signer of the Declaration of Independence; Wyatt (d. 1840) noted English architect and Cobden (d. 1865) English statesman, known as the "Manchester apostle of free trade."

Richard Wagner (1813-83) always called although his first name was Wilhelm, was one of the greatest of composers of operas and a master of orchestration, besides being his own librettist.

The Battle of the Skagerrak

The Battle of Jutland was called the Battle of the Skagerrak by the Germans. It was fought in the Skagerrak between the British Grand fleet, under Admiral Sir J. R. Jellicoe, and the German High Seas fleet, under Admiral Reinhard Scheer, on May 31, 1916. The encounter is memorable as being the only occasion throughout the World war on which the rival battle fleets met, also for the fact that it left the British fleet undisputed master of the German one in the day of the latiers' surrender.
