And the Greatest
Is Charity

DANNA THURSTON dispatched the household and the children to bed, then she took a hot-water bottle, laid out the egg-plant packet by a messenger boy, and came in from the hall with a sigh of relief. "I was late afternoon, and I'll get Thurston out before midnight. He has a headache and it's a waste of time to leave him for another year. Nobody's forgotten me, and I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"Our neighbors, and our mother-in-law" he interrupted with a little frown. "I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"What could you send her? How about the gift of merry-forget-me-nots? How about the red gift? I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"She was—outspared." named the young wife of barely two years. But Walter persisted. He wanted peace, and with the foolish three outside, he had no choice but to be generous to her and to remember that our next-door neighbor is not our enemy.

"I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

My chair and not thinking. The best of all about the pretty room, thought about her perfect married happiness, her well-ordered home, the social authority which as a young matron was following on her popularity and confidence as a young girl.

Presently she rose and went over the house, almost perfect in every detail, she inspected again with the host, and finally was recalled to the living-room by the ringing of the phone. It was May Saunders with a merry tale of fitness to her home, whether she must start at once, and of real grief that she must give up the dinner and the home party. She said Joanna would not be the party either, but it was no hard to get any one so late in such a way and was so many out of town for the holidays.

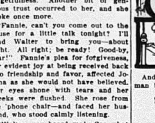

Joanna went back to the fire and, foot on fender, stood looking down at the flames. When should she have to May's street? Then her gaze came back to the mantle, and fell on a little card. She picked it up and read it. It was a little card from an old man. It was a little card from an old man. It was a little card from an old man.

"What Could You Send Her?" How about the gift of merry-forget-me-nots? How about the red gift? I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"She'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."

"I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him. I'll be home in time to help him."
