Extravagance of Economy

"Robert," said Mrs. Tuttle, "I wish you would get a carpenter to fix that back porch; some will be hurt if it isn't attended to soon."

"All right," said Tuttle. "I know a man that will do it for one-half what a carpenter would charge. I think I can send him to do the job tomorrow."

"Robert Tuttle," exclaimed his wife, "I said I wanted a carpenter and a carpenter I am going to have. There shall be no more tramps and jobbers about this place!"

"Well, if you had to earn the money," protested Tuttle, "I think you wouldn't object so constantly to every effort I make to practice a little economy."

Mrs. Tuttle smiled. "Your efforts at economy usually prove to be boomerangs," she observed.

"Bosh!" said Tuttle.

"Perhaps you have forgotten the time I asked you to get a plumber to mend a leak in the bathroom and you sent a tramp tinner away out here," persisted Mrs. Tuttle. "He came with a bar of solder and a soldering iron, but no furnace; so he had to heat his iron on the kitchen range, and by the time he got to the bathroom with it the iron would be too cold to melt the solder. When he had made at least a dozen trips without results he decided that if he had one light he would succeed better.

"And he had the audacity to ask me to hold a candle for him.

"Well, I lay down under the washstand and held the candle for him until I had a fellow feeling for those Most Indian fakirs who hold their arms in one position until the arms grow dead. Your foolish frequent trips to the kitchen gave me welcome opportunities to rest my arm. A candle grease out of my sleeve where it had dripped.

"Still, he evidently forgot that I was there, for he said several things that you would not like say one bit yourself to say in my presence.

"Another time I didn't like was the reflection he cast upon my sex. He called the iron, the solder, the pipe—in fact, everything he used—male trouble for him—she,' which seemed dreadfully unjust when I was faithfully giving my services.

"Finally he gave it up until he could borrow a soldering pot, he said. Then he wondered if I had anything sticky that he could wrap that pipe with in the meantime. I told him after a lot of thinking that I had some sticky fly paper, but I mentally hoped that I might not be asked to assist in adjusting it to the broken water pipe.

"I watched with misgiving the laborious process of cutting that sticky stuff into strips, and was not at all surprised that he was soon hopelessly stuck on the fly paper, or the fly paper was hopelessly stuck on him; there were times when I couldn't tell which. I could do nothing less than try to relieve him, so in a little while I had all the fly paper stuck to me.

"We stood back and forth, sometimes one having it all, sometimes dividing it equally, and then again swinging it jointly—he being attached to one end of a strip and I to the other.

"That game went one for some time, when by sheer luck I got the fly paper on the pipe and we lost no time in winding it around and closing the hole. But we found that it was the hot-water pipe, and when the water flowed the paper loosened and the whole mess that it was when he began.

"I think you will recall," said Mrs. Tuttle, how we spent a day cleaning a tub that night to save the ceiling below. And he sent for a dollar and charged just about double the regular price to do the thing for me—and he had a companion man fooling with it. I don't call that economy!

"No, sir, I prefer to have a full-fledged boss fob, union-label carpenter to fix that decrepit back porch," finished Mrs. Tuttle with decision.

Tuttle waited a few moments before finally and said: "I surrender; please observe my flag of truce and let this slaughter cease. Have your carpenter; and if you think you can get enough lumber to make it you need not bother coming down to dinner. I'll take pity on the timber that remains and I've added that it's economy to buy you one!"

Silence in the House.

An timed silence is very much like it. Ask of the man who has a wife.

How They Say Good Night

Good-night is a very simple combination of two simple words, and ordinarily it is very easy to say it. You hear it everywhere, and in the first of everybody.

But there are times in a man's life when it is a most stupendous undertaking to say good-night.

When he has been to visit the lodestar of his affections, and pater familias and his wife have both retired out, and gone discreetly to bed, and the grateful music of their snoring is coming refreshingly down the stairway, mingled with the sound of the clock on the church steeple slowly striking the hour of midnight, then the ordeal begins.

He knows it is time to say good-night, and so he decides it is awfully, and would fain put far off the dreadful moment. And she feels just the same. She knows that her eyes will be red next day from loss of sleep, and that she will feel like "a stewed witch," however that may be; and he realizes that how all the columns of figures he is always adding will run together next day, and how the 'old man" will snort when he finds him nagging over the ledger, and how the boys in the office will quote lovesick poetry to him, and otherwise make themselves at least fairly disagreeable as they know.

He rises at last with the firm determination in his heart that he will say it, and have it over.

"Mabel, dear," he must go. It is awfully late, and your dear little head ought to have been tied up pillow long ago. I am such a thoughtless, selfish fellow. I must say good-night and let you get a bit of sleep, before the sun rises. Well, good-night—"

Then she backs at him, and she says:

"Archie, must you? Oh, dear, it isn't late at all. It's only just a little bit past eleven, and I haven't said half what I wanted to. I had lots and lots of things to tell you, and—"

"It is after midnight, darling, and your pa has stopped snoring, and I heard him clearing his throat just now, as if he were preparing to say something."

"Oh, Archie, don't you mind about dad. He's got a cold, and couldn't help he clears his pipes a good deal. He'll doze off in a minute. Must you go? Well, good-night, then."

"Yes, dear, good-night. Oh, don't come out to the child night air. You might get cold, and I should never forgive myself, never. Good-night—"

"Good-night, Archie. Would you really and truly care if I should kiss you?"

"My dearest! I should die if anything happened to you! Well, good-night, and, hark! Was that your father calling you?"

"No, indeed! That was the cat over cellar. I don't believe you would care very much if I should go into a decline and die. You'd get over it after a little, and marry that fatefully-redheaded Miss Jones, and I'd get out the sight of her. Well, good-night!"

"Mabel, you know I wouldn't look at Kate Girling! Old freckled-faced thing! You little goose, you! Well, really, I must go now. That is the clock, by Jove! Well, good-night!"

By this time he has got his arm around her waist, and finding that he has in his, to give him courage to speak the distressing words of parting, she has the distressing words of said button, and twists it so convincingly that it won't be detached at all, hark! Was that your Wife Got Tip Top Advice.

"My wife wanted me to take our boy to the doctor to cure an ugly boil," writes D. Frankel, of Norwal, Okla. "I said just Bucklens Arnica Salve on it." She did so, and it cured the boil in short time." Quickest healer of Burns, Scalds, Cuts, Corns, Bruises, Sprains, Swellings. Best Pile cure on earth. Try it. Only 25c at HARRINGTON PHARMACY.

Know Little of Corn's Value.

The use of Indian corn as a food product is very limited in the United Kingdom, and there are reasons for it other than the absence of taste. Apparently the British public is not properly enlightened as to the various ways of preparing tinned corn, corn meal and bonnby. It would seem that little is known of the vegetable itself, as recipes in some English cookbooks make very meager reference to its preparation.

A Gift Book.

To give a book is to enrich the receiver permanently; to put into his or her possession something which leaves readdum of pleasure long after the particular day on which it was received has been forgotten.—Hamilton W. Mable.

Appearances are Deceiving

The actual worth of women or cigars cannot be determined by their looks. Many women select their cigars by color, the shape and the smoothness of the wrapper. And how often their beautifully brown and symmetrical perfecto proves a sorry and a delusion. Call for a Best & Russell Co's 1857 cigar and you will always get a good value and a good smoke.
