The great automobile strikes of 1937 in Michigan are now a part of history. A new part of it is the law on labor disputes which was enacted by the Michigan legislature.

This law, known as the Industrial Disputes act, may be regarded as the legislators' deduction from the events of a crucial six months of labor strikes. It is intended in large measure by the views of Governor Murphy, who had hoped to make of it a model for wider acceptance throughout the nation.

The new act aims at preventing a recurrence of such industrial battles by removing, as the preamble states, some of the causes of such disputes and providing facilities for their prompt settlement.

In substance the act parallels two federal statutes on labor relations and in some respects enters on new territory.

A "yellow dog" contract is an agreement made between employer and employee under which the employee agrees not to belong to a union. The Michigan statute declares that such a contract is against public policy and shall not be enforceable in the courts. The same applies to an agreement binding the employee to belong to an organization sponsored by the employer.

Injunctions by state courts are prohibited which would have the effect of forbidding peaceful picketing. A former state law had outlawed picketing, but this act specifically declares it to be legal, although it sets clearly defined limits to this activity.

Thus obstructing the entrance of a person to a plant or residence is prohibited. So also is blocking of a highway as an incident to picketing. Furthermore, those not a party to an industrial dispute and not an official of a union involved are forbidden to take part in such efforts toward making strikes effective.

Like the National Labor Relations act, this law provides for enner speech on March 4 of this year. He then said he wanted to retire from the white house on January 20, 1941—but that he wanted to do so with his program completed and the principles for which he has stood firmly established.

President Roosevelt was asked point-blank at a press conference whether he would accept another term. He parried the question with some remarks about the weather and a fawning counter-thrust at his questioner.

While the silver cords of tradition during nearly a century and a half have made the two-term precedent firmly binding, with almost the moral force of law, there have been a few historical attempts to disregard it.

Will Franklin D. Roosevelt permit himself to be made a third-term presidential candidate in 1940?

This question surges to the surface of political speculation as result of current efforts of Gov. George H. Earle (Dem.) of Pennsylvania to launch a third-term boom for Mr. Roosevelt, by means of a rousing endorsement for his re-election.

Political observers are recalling that it was Pennsylvania leadership, coupled with that in New York, commanding the big blocks of convention delegates from these two most populous states, that nearly put Gen. U. S. Grant across as a third-term nominee in 1880.

It is also being pointed out that while the two-term precedent laid down by President Washington has become fairly firmly established, Mr. Roosevelt has not hesitated to shatter what he has considered outward traditions. His tradition-smashing has included favoring abolition of the two-thirds rule in democratic conventions, which now makes it easier for a party leader to secure nomination by a simple majority of convention delegates instead of the two-thirds required since the days of Andrew Jackson, who established that historic rule.

The only public reference Mr. Roosevelt has made to the 1940 succession was in his Victory dis-
