NEW CAPITALISM

The responsibility for leadership in the economic crisis that confronts America today rests upon those who have for four years or more insisted that the administration with its policy of deficit spending was embarked upon a course of emergency opportunism.

The change from deficit spending to private spending is here. What principles should guide us in the transition period?

First and foremost there must be general recognition of the fact that government intervention in the economic affairs of a country is not a question of mere intrusion but of the degree to which the citizenry will permit by common consent the extension of government aid.

No economic system in any country in the world today can function without some form of government intervention. Fifty years ago we introduced government intervention on a more intensified basis than America had known it before by passing a law establishing a federal commission to fix the price of transportation.

When you fix the price of shipping in internal commerce, you profoundly affect economic balance as between regions, as between producers and consumers, as between competitors in business.

When, moreover, you pass a tariff law, you permit government intervention to fix domestic prices almost up to the level of the tariff wall—a custom that goes back farther than just fifty years in our history.—The United States News.

The taxpayer, in the last analysis, pays the bill. Up to now, at least, it has not been clearly demonstrated that government monopoly removed from the free play of competitive opinion, judgment and pressure, can deliver a product, whether it be a proud naval vessel or a pair of shoes, more cheaply than can competitive industry.

WHAT'S GOING ON IN WASHINGTON

(Courtesy The United States News)

Lines of unemployed at the unemployment offices of American industrial concerns once more are growing longer.

In September, the first month of the present recession in industrial output, "layoffs" in some factories were offset by seasonal increases in agricultural employment and in other lines of activity.

In October the sharp drop in steel mill, textile factory, machine shop and other factory production, and in the construction industry caused an increase of 100,000 in the number of unemployed. This occurred despite the increase in employment from seasonal jobs as corn picking on the farms and Christmas trade in the stores.

Again in November, in spite of what is normally a net gain in employment because of the hiring of additional clerks for the holiday trade, it is estimated there will be an increase of 400,000 in the number of unemployed.

Moreover, the cycle of depression has only set in. As lay-offs in steel and other basic industries are reflected in retail trade it is expected that still fewer goods will be bought and the number of unemployed will grow.

By February, according to the forecasts of governmental economists, the unemployed may have increased by 2,400,000 in number, an increase from 6,082,000 in September to 8,000,000 in January.

This means that in four months, unemployment totals may rise above the level of a year ago and in nearly the same point as in January, 1932.

Here is the total of unemployment on January 1 of the last six years as shown by an extension of the unemployment figures originally compiled for the Committee on Economic Security: 1937, 8,329 million; 1936, 9,882 million; 1935, 10,433 million; 1934, 11,543 million; and in 1933, 12,426 million.

Between September and February 1, the records for the last four years show, there usually is an increase of about one million in the number of unemployed. The increase in prospect this year is about three times as large as usual.

As the country heads into another period of growing unemployment, the available employment data show that construction, mining, transportation and public utilities have shown the least recovery from the depression lows.

For most industries the tide in unemployment began to turn in March 1933, when there were 13 million unemployed.

Until the recent slump, manufacturing was the largest source of unemployment. The subject among the foremost in Washington in view of possible relationship between the Douglas statement and the administration's new approachability on problems of unemployment.

Those acquainted with the chairman believe he would have made such important assertions on policy at just the time without the knowledge of President Roosevelt.
