Why They Grow Old.

It is noticed that farmers grow old earlier in life than town men and any one who has lived on a farm knows it is because of the strain on a man in spring and summer, when his working hours are from four or five in the morning until eight or nine at night. Fifteen to seventeen hours of hard labor with every nerve at high tension especially during harvest time. Then comes the lesser work of the fall with just about enough exercise to keep him limber. Later the winter season when he seems to stagnate, gets fat and his flesh loses its firmness. And when he is the least fit, comes the labor of spring. These changes of work, so heavy at times and light at others, tell against his enduring power and at forty-five he begins to be rheumatic, easily affected by the sun, heart gives out and his ability to work hard that what it used to be. While a man whose hours are regular and shorter will walk with a still youthful step at fifty-five and be called in the prime of life.

Mrs. S. G. Seebert visited the J. J. Smith home in Cary Wednesday.

City people marvel at the cheapness of everything in Barrington. "What only fifteen cents for such a fine supper?" "Such a fine house for $12.00 rent?" "Household for $3.00, why we pay more?" and so on about everything. Groceries, houses, light, water, etc. of Barrington is a fine town.

years old he married Miss Julia Barber coming west to Tonies, Ill., where he practiced medicine several years. In 1878 they moved to Oak Park, where he enjoyed a large practice until failing health caused him to give it up. Nine children were born, but only two survive. Mrs. W. L. Roggess, of Oak Park and Mrs. E. A. Stewart of Austin. His wife died in 1901. For many years Dr. Wood owned the Chicago Vaccine Station disposing of that business four years ago. In October 1894 the doctor married Mrs. Emma Williams and has since then lived in Palatine.

All who knew him could not help but be deeply impressed with his sincerity and honesty of purpose. The characteristics of his life must be an incentive to greater endeavor on the part of those left behind. It is difficult to estimate the greatness of his work here and elsewhere. His acquaintances profited by his faithfulness. Whenever a call of duty came he was ready to respond and whenever he undertook a task it was well and faithfully done.

Words cannot express what the church of which he was a member has lost. His life has shown us what a Christian man can do and be in the home, in the church, in the society, as a friend in all walks of life. Surely he has not lived in vain.

Y. M. C. A. Notes

CONTRIBUTED.

Don't miss any dates for Friday evening, March 1st, unless it is to the Y. M. C. A. popular evening. Everybody invited.

Next Sunday Rev. Dr. Swan and Rev. Bruce Jackson will speak. Both men are from Chicago. All men are invited to be present.

Did you attend the popular evening at the Y. M. C. A. rooms last Friday evening? About eighty of our young people did. And after singing several songs and listening to a number of selections by the orchestra, small tables were placed in two rooms, and some played dominoes, ping pong and croquet, while others played outdoor games in the gym.

Rev. V. V. Phelps gave a very interesting talk last Sunday on the subject of "The hero of the hour." Among other things he said "The greater hero is the hero in peace." "A hero works for good of country." "A chance for some of the Barrington men to show heroism by building a Y. M. C. A. building for their boys." And "Christians especially ought not to neglect the needs of our children." Brother Phelps' talk was right to the point. We hope to hear from him again.

An Allegory.

A King once built a magnificent city and invited all people to come and make this city their home. He sent his only son (the prince) away and he also sent messengers to tell the people of this city and to persuade them to take the pathway the Prince had prepared for it was the only way that led to the home of the King.

One of the messengers went to a small village to tell the story of the King's plan. In this village lived a family whose progenitor was Mr. Greedy Well-To-Do, his wife, Miss Pleasure and two sons, Conceit and Faithful.

The messenger's words touched each member of the family and they all decided to start for the city. When they started Faithful pressed close to the guide, who was none other than the King's son who had built this way.

They traveled on for some distance and they then came to a place where a path led out from the one they had been traveling. It was a fine line and men rushing and scrambling over it. Another, Mr. W. turned back and saw that this was a large crowd, they were trying to get, and he began to scramble for it while his family went on and left him.

They passed on until they reached a place where a great many women were passing in. Mrs. W. joined the crowd for they were what she called the select set. They entered and found many seated around tables playing with cards, not gambling, just playing for a china-teapot. This was just a place of recreation or enjoyment called a club. All thought of entering again upon the straight and narrow way was eluded from her mind.

And the three children went on their way. Faithful was near the guide line, Conceit and Miss Pleasure had fallen farther to the rear.

These two did not go much farther for they arrived at the place of worldly amusement and Miss Pleasure went whirling and dancing away with a fellow with his hair parted in the middle and a cigarette in his mouth.

Conceit went in at this place also and indulged freely in the drink of the place, saying "I can turn back whenever I want to," not so to say, he was home on the wide and the multitude farther and farther from the narrow way.

Faithful went on with his hand holding the hand of the guide and got home at last to the Beautiful City and since he had been faithful until he reached the end of the King gave him a crown which faded not away, as he had promised to give to all who would be faithful.

Kitty's Goblins

By Paul Crewick

(Copyright by Joseph B. Hewlett.)

It was two weeks before Christmas. I had been shopping and as I turned out of a department store I fancied I saw my ladyship just entering. A dozen quick strides made fancy into reality.

"Dear me, Reggie," exclaimed Kitty, trying to make out that she was not secretly highly delighted, "what a very ubiquitous person you are, nowadays!" "I have a good reason for coming," I announced, taking the chair next her.

"Meaning that, perhaps, some other people have not," she inquired. "My presence here is the result of kindness and philanthropy," I explained. "I have been buying things for people. Item, a bottle of lavender water for a friend. Item, some physic for Debenham, who says he can't sleep at nights. Item, a new hat for one of my friends. Item, but I can't remember half of the various commissions I have been faithfully executing. You, of course, haven't been half so useful."

Kitty was absorbed in a nursery book, and wouldn't attempt any defense. "Are you sure it's quite suitable for a child?" she asked the attendant. Really, these ladies seem so advanced. I suppose children do read them."

"Uncles and aunts and godparents buy them," I remarked. "Therefore we have some evidence that children like them. What I know of children—" "Isn't a great deal?" questioned Kitty, with one of her little shrugs. "I understand, dear."

"Come and have tea with me," I requested. "I have opened a new tea-room. It's rather jolly, and the cakes are very good. I want to talk to you about Christmas. We're going to stay at Homewood. An old-fashioned family gathering sort of thing. I'm praying that we shan't all quarrel too violently before the end of it."

"Lead on, and I'll follow—if the cakes can be confidently recommended. But a large place this is! And doesn't everything look tempting and Christmasy?" Kitty sighed. "It makes me feel awfully ashamed of myself," she went on, as we moved to the dining room.

"So the dinner party?" I inquired gently. "Yes. It's to be at the shop where we first met. After hours, a Goblins' dinner party on Christmas Eve. Lot of us and I have been so busy and now ranging and rearranging and now I'm coming to you. They must have amusement—a conjurer, or something."

"But I'm not a conjurer—" "Can't you be a Father Christmas, Reggie?" In a gown and with white hair and a long beard? You can get the things from some theatrical place, can't you? And after the conjurer, and after a "bunch and Judy" show I want you to come in with a great sack over your shoulder, full of toys. A present for every solitary goblin there. A present and a kind word—so that they can go on a little while longer. Can bear with things, because of one completely happy hour. Oh, it's so little that we can do, Reggie. The world's four stone walls can't be broken down all at once. It can be given them all my memory. These poor little goblins—and he builds on memories."

"Always, Kitty." "Always. Could there be surer foundation?"

The Feltenhausen family have gone to Dundee to live.

The mill at Cuba is running early and late since the Pomeroy fire.

Miss Elsie Klein gave a party this week for her cousins, Ella and Hattie Klein, who move to Dundee Friday.

Miss Leila Glynn, teacher at the Flint Creek school reports a progressive and prosperous winter for the twenty-five pupils.

Mr. Martin, cook on the McGraw farm, is ill in Cuba at his niece's, Mrs. James McGraw.

Dominick Antonitis has returned to work on the Harmon farm after living in Chicago all winter.

August Goswell and family have moved to the Houghtaling farm near Chun Creek.

The young people surprised Andrew Grom with a party Saturday evening and Charles Grom and wife were tendered another party Sunday evening by the older neighbors.

Miss Edith Leach of Nunda, a music teacher, has several Saturday pupils in this neighborhood.

"My dear," said I, at that, "I can well believe it."

"Don't be silly, Reggie. And please don't sit quite so near me. Everybody is peeping at us. Well, now, this little man—"

"It was a man?"

"No, a goblin—a goblin with a white little face, and ragged clothes; whose shriveled hands were thrust deep into bottomless pockets. Its small nose was glued to the window of the shop. If seen I started, I started. Reggie. It was alone, and it was poor."

I waited for her to go on. There was no mistaking the fact that Kitty was in earnest.

"I glanced at him quietly, from behind. I guessed that this goblin had seen many, many winters; but never a summer. Which sort would you choose?" I asked, bending quickly down to him. He made no answer; but I could see that he knew every sweet in that shop. "I am speaking to you," I said more loudly.

"Well, he smiled his nose slowly. 'I was counting them candy cans,' he told me severely. 'That's why I didn't listen.' I held out my hand. Let us go inside and count them together," I suggested. He hopped in before me like any little frog. We counted the candy cans and other things; and presently—oh, it was the most laughing thing in the world, if it hadn't been the most pitiable—this goblin of mine brought out from under his rags a poor miserable little cat, very dusty and red-eyed, and with a broken leg."

Kitty gasped. "It's dead now, poor little creature. I'm thankful to say. Well, Reggie, he wanted the cat to have some of the goodies I—we had bought. And, of course, the animal wouldn't look at them. I want him to like candy, said my goblin. 'He must have some. I want him to be happy—like me. He's my cat, you know.' And then, Reggie, he added a rather disliking sentence. 'I fought him for him last Tuesday. I did. And me and that little cat, we've gone halves ever since.'"

Kitty addressed herself directly to me. "Wouldn't you have known what kind of sweets to give a cat? I confess, it was a puzzle." She laughed at the thought. "At last the bird behind the counter fed the goblin some milk; and the cat tried to drink and purred at the same time. And it drank so much that it began to be very ill, Reggie. And then the goblin, with whom I was getting on so nicely—"

She was stirring her tea again. "He pulled his cold sticky fingers away from me, and ran to the choking dreadful little cat and caught it in his arms, and held it close to his starved breast. And he cried, Reggie, oh, not loudly, not loudly. But utterly, hopelessly."

"So the dinner party?" I inquired gently. "Yes. It's to be at the shop where we first met. After hours, a Goblins' dinner party on Christmas Eve. Lot of us and I have been so busy and now ranging and rearranging and now I'm coming to you. They must have amusement—a conjurer, or something."
