May Woo Man of Her Choice with Fitness

By HELEN OLDFIELD.

BIOM time immemorial all the traditions of her sex have forbidden a woman to me; nevertheless, that the may and does woo the man of her cloice, and frequently with secroes, is a fact which hone can dispute nor deny. Most of us know men whom to the best of our innevelogs and belief never could have meatered courage to propose to their wires unless those with the second of the courage to propose to their wires unless those with the second of the courage to propose to their wires unless those with the second of the courage to the courage to the second of the man the second of the second worth the trealls of the chase. Among the leave which move humanity there are few more powerful than that of wounded vanity. Besides, the code of polite society excets that all well-bed women shall make themsives agreemed and entertaining to all man as well as to all women whom they meet in social interactions, ench courtey by no means theirig the least part, of their duty for their may the courte of the himself friendly.

She who wishes to attract a man must be charming in order to charm; Sine who wants to attract a man must be charming in order to chair, those who wish to be loved must show themselves lovable, must think of other people rather than of themselves. There is no greater obstacle to social success, given a fulerum, than that of overweening self-conscious-

Must she let him go and make no sign? It all depends upon whether or no he is reluctant to go. She may hold out her hand, ves, if he holds out his, but she must not becken, still less must she call him to her or cling. The woman whom a man, even for a little while, has loved equify to be able to make it impossible for him to leave her. How shall she do this? Not by cloying of sweets, not by a surfelt

They are so afraid that it will pass them by that they much at whatever pretty counterfeit comes their way. Which is a mistake. However excellent a man may be, be essentially is human, and for him the sweetest fruit is that which hangs high.

The woman who wishes to attract a man must be just a little out of reach. Not too far; the thing may be overdone. If he climb, ever so slightly, she is there. It no longer is enough that a woman should be pretty; the woman who to-day would marry must know how to win a lover, must combine the charm of the serpent with the gentleness of the dove.

Third Degree" As a Battle of Wits

Inspector James S. McCaffert

curdling, terrifying third degree that the magazine and melodrama writers like to talk about—is a myth. There never has been any such soul-trying experience in store for the wrongdoer who falls into the hands of the authorities since the days of the Spanish inquisition.

the Spanish inquisition.

The third degree to-day is a duel of wits—a matching of will and power, with the detective or inquisitor pitting his strength of will and force of argument against that of the suspect. No physical orce is used, no intimidation through bodily injury, no confinement in dark, noise ome, foully smelling cells, no starvily injury, no commement in carry, noisoner, courty asserting crists he starting until exhaustion drives the suspect to confess. It is nothing but a merciless, persistent, insistent questioning, interspersed with forceful arguments that in the long run, if the man be guilty, rarely fail to accomments that in the long run, if the man be guilty, rarely fail to accom-ments that in the long in, it is man as easily a specific plais their purpose.

Whatever third degree methods are employed in my department I employ myself. I usually see the suspect alone in my office, or, at the most, with one other himman, reserved. There is no display of datality and the most proposed in instead, we are usually in civilian dress. I make the majoral transity that the first for some time. It is absolutely necessary that I know with what I have to contend. If the man he surly and sulfall I must use methods very different from those I use if he be quick, alert and intellectual. It is for me first of all to learn what the noemitarities of this man may be, what his individuality may be whether heave the content of th

If there be any third degree in our detective bureau to-day, that is what it is. It is simply pitting a stronger will against a weaker one. We do, however, seek out the weak spots in the armor of lies and deceit, with which crooks arround themselves, and once we find it we pound away at it until they break down and confess.

Abysmal Depths of Personality
