ONE OF CUPID'S WAYS

The Jilted Girl and the Man Who Couldn't Make Love.

By SARAH LINDSAY CAMPBELL
The car that went to Oretook park was crowded. It usually was when there was a promise of a fine evening.

Brooks gazed steadily from the window of the unpretentious side of the car. Even when the passengers began to get to the other side to look into the valley far below them and at the mountains—mountain peaks on top of mountains—did not flutter.

At the County club he passed he showed some interest. It was Miss Hilderbrand's afternoon to post ten there, 245 months before, when Miss Hilderbrand had poured her. Brooks sat on the clubhouse steps. The laughter of gay voices had drifted through the open windows to him. The "depress" at the dress and hat Brooks was a club member, but he was not.

An illness had sent him to the resort town to recuperate. Most of the hotel people belonged to the club. He had had. It seemed to him a good way to get rid of the time that hung so heavily on his hands.

But he didn't care for the resort town. He couldn't dance, he knew so little of the new books and the old pictures, the assumed and other things that he had had. He was an alien. Looking up he saw Miss Hilderbrand on the steps above him.

Miss Hilderbrand was the leader of the fashionable set at the County club. Her clothes were limited, but expensive. Brooks had wondered that so recently a woman could be so beautiful. He had noted that the charm of a delicate nose and the smile that came just thought so more about her. Her women were not much in his line either.

Miss Hilderbrand had come down on him and said that she wanted him to drink and drink to his health. And when she smiled the question of Brooks was settled.

After that day Brooks became a real member of the club. The women left younger men to talk to him. The men slapped him on the back, invited him to drinks and voted him a first class brook.

He began to enjoy the life and the new spirit of freedom that pervaded the atmosphere. There was no more talk of leaving this circle of bright pretty women and jolly fellows. Brooks realized that he owed the change to Miss Hilderbrand. Once he had seen why she had taken him up and she realized that she was sorry for lonely times.

Brooks had made a new man of Brooks, and still he lingered. People had come and gone, as he did at resort hotels, but Miss Hilderbrand had not gone.

The afternoon had again come for her to post tea for the club members. Johnson, a friend and fellow citizen of hers, said that she had gone on the mountains to be alone and get a grip on herself; that a telegram had brought her bad news.

The car climbed slowly. Brooks had the slightest idea what the trouble was, nor what assistance he could render. There was but one desire in his bosom heart, and that was to help her. How he would like to be revealed; but, with his usual diffidence, he had followed her to find out.

On the mountain top the band played, and gay groups of people moved in every direction. Brooks came upon Miss Hilderbrand solitary in the midst of the crowd. The glow of the sunset was on her face, but she came up she smiled not steadily.

"Miss Hilderbrand, you heard it. I leave tomorrow. I hoped it would be out, but of course everybody will know."

"I'm not everybody," said Brooks stoutly. "At least I am not. I want to comfort lonely people. What can I do?"

Miss Hilderbrand's glance went over Brooks' stout figure and came back to his clear eyes. The two faces were in sharp contrast—in his rugged strength and in a more simple situation, in the girl's suggestion of extreme slight. "I'd like to remember it when I've become a divanage. That's what I've been up here deciding—'what to do with myself now—that the money's easy to get. I've been thinking of a real trade, and, with another attempt at a suit. 'I'm thought to be such an uncommon young woman.'"

"What then, Miss Hilderbrand?" Brooks spoke that came with difficulty. Among the men there was not to be detected, and it was just as well that he was not. "I've been thinking of a real trade, and, with another attempt at a suit. 'I'm thought to be such an uncommon young woman.'"

"I've been jilted." She looked across the valley filled with mist and not at Brooks. "I'd like to remember it when I've become a divanage. That's what I've been up here deciding—'what to do with myself now—that the money's easy to get. I've been thinking of a real trade, and, with another attempt at a suit.
