Races Have Odor

It is quite possible that other races can detect the odor of the white race. Deniker, in his "The Race of Man," refers to the fact that certain travelers have asserted they could recognize a population by its odor. The author admits that some ethnic profiles have their specific odor, which is fainter with scrupulous cleanliness, but never disappears.

Turning the Tables

In the days of imperial Rome there was a crane among men—"table man." Italy called it, for the collection of rare tables made of Mauritania wood and inlaid with ivory. Competition among the wealthy made the tables costly and, so the story goes, when husbands accused their ladies of extravagance the ladies retorted with: "What about your tables?" which is supposed to have originated the phrase—"turning the tables on them."

Fish Turns Into Ball
