Very real objection. Many of his acquaintances have developed into his most worthwhile friends. Talk young Grover as an example. When he began coming to our home he was a big uncouth chap whose table manners were atrocious. But he was ambitious. Left an orphan, very young, he had spent most of his life with some relatives on a farm and now trudged several miles each day over country roads to reach the school. He was a very obedient boy. He had come into contact with few of the small but important amenities of life, at home and he soon became conscious of this handicap. But instead of developing an inferiority complex, he began looking around him, thoughtfully studying his new acquaintances, and at length adopting those behavior patterns that he thought were his own.
