Cotton offers an example of the way it would work.

This country produces twice as much cotton as its mills consume. The foreign market is essential to the prosperity of the south. But that foreign market is narrowing. To meet that situation, the government through the AAA would offer cotton growers who agreed to cooperate under its plan a "partity price" on the domestic portion of the crop. The remainder of the crop would be permitted to seek a market at what ever price it would bring. If world competition necessitated a return to five-cent coiton, the price of the seport part of that crop would be allowed to go to that level.

But this plan raises two vital questions. wall, Puerto rateo and use virging lislands. President Roosevelt talked, in advance of senate action, of veto unless adjustments were made. But representatives of domestic sugar products and of domestic refiners worked on as they had been for months. They argued that the American sugar farmer needed the protected market; that the refining industry—operating at less than two-thirds capacity—also needed protection and could not compete with foreign refinery labor.
