"Time and the Conways," a play by J. B. Priestley, was reviewed at the library rooms Tuesday afternoon, April 12 as the last offering of the literature committee for this year. Mrs. Lester Hinfine, who gave the review, said that she had not chosen the play for its entertainment value but because its unusual theme had held her and almost compelled her to do it rather than a lighter or a more amusing one. It chronicles the humdrum happenings of an ordinary family, their lives and their relationships with each other as they are a part of continual and never-ending time. Mrs. Higgins referred her listeners to a book by J. W. Dunn and also a novel by Mr. Priestley, "Midnight on the Desert" for a better understanding of the time theory as set forth in this play. Briefly stated, as it comes from Allan, one of the characters in the play, "time is a kind of dream. If it wasn't it would have to destroy everything—the whole universe—and then remake it again every tenth of a second. But Time doesn't destroy anything. It merely moves us on—in this life—from one peep-hole to the next."

The play is in three acts. The characters and scenes are the same in all three but the time is different. It opens in 1918 at the close of the World war, skips to the present for its second act, and returns to 1919 for the final phase. Mrs. Higgins, sensitive to the mystery and beauty of the theme, read the play with understanding. She was pleasing and informal in her manner and provided those who heard her review with not only a pleasant afternoon's entertainment, but an inspiration to
