many countries where food and methods of serving are substantially the same as they were generations or centuries ago, is especially notable among the leading meat packers.

An example of this is tender made ham, which in the two years since its introduction has become famous, from coast to coast, as "the ham you cut with a fork."

But the popularity of this ham rests on more than the tenderness which is not duplicated in any other ham. It is largely due to a distinctive palate delighting flavor that no other ham can offer, and to the fact that it is ready to serve as you buy it or just heat and eat.

Another effect of the secret process of preparing tender made hams is that the natural juices are retained, giving the ham a distinctive flavor that can be achieved in no other way.
