Soldiers Wore Gorgeous Uniforms to Bluff Enemy
The British soldiers who wore red coats—became a "lobster back" at the beginning of the Eighteenth century. In those days uniforms worn in the field were of the same color as the uniforms worn in the barracks...

The Colonial had no drill, but they had a reputation for being much better shot than the best soldiers in Europe. It was difficult to obtain cloth for uniforms. General Washington recommended a garb composed of homespun, with coats like hunting shirts and long trousers.

"It is a dress," he said, "justly supposed to carry no small terror to an enemy who think every such person a murderer." The hunting shirts were usually white and fringed, but some regiments were yellow, green or blue.

The delicate beauty of the flower had not been a source of satisfaction to man its fruit would certainly have been regarded as highly perfumed and appear often on tables in the tropics.

Tight breeches went out of fashion in the French Revolution and the long trousers came in. Officers tucked their breeches into the boots at the turn of the century, American infantry were plugged hats, topped with a feather, but this did not last long.

Bucharest Rug Market Is an Open Air Attraction
The most important rug market of Rumania, Rumania, from the viewpoint of travelers, is not in a shop or store at all, but in the open air along the river front. There large rugs are displayed to prospective customers on a long clothes-line arrangement, with the smaller ones are hung from street lamps.

Connect Passion Flower With Lord's Crucifixion
The same passion flower, across from the resemblance of the floral parts to important implements of Christ's crucifixion, the resemblance being first pointed out by early Italian and Spanish travelers.

Some of the early religious men saw in the corona the crown of thorns, others thought it the halo; to some of them the five stamens were the five wounds, to others, writes Henricks Hodge in Nature Magazine, they represented the hammers used to drive the nails, represented by the three-knobbed styles. Five sepals, together with five petals, stood for the ten apostles—Peter, who denied, and Judas, who betrayed, were left out of the reckoning.

Legend and superstition have long been associated with these beautiful blooms. In "Plant Lore, Legends and Lyrics," Folkard states that when the Spaniards first saw the rich festoons of this plant hanging from the branches of the forest trees they regarded the magnificent blossom as a token that the Indians should be converted to Christianity, as they saw in its several parts the emblems of the Passion of our Lord.

Famous Cathedral in Havana
The cathedral of Havana is a famous church. It is built of native limestone; it is also the most noteworthy architecturally. It was erected between 1650 and 1724 and was long believed to shelter the bones of Columbus. Historians dispute about his tomb, some holding that it is in Santo Domingo, whence his bones were supposed to have been taken some decades after his death, some holding that it is in Havana and some in Spain.
